Adobe seems to be making a real effort to improve the interface and also to emulate the way people edit images today. The former is a bit hit-or-miss, with small changes like reducing the amount of tooltips appearing in the editing window, removing "undesirable" tooltips, and generally making Lightroom a bit less of a resource hog. Those who like too many tooltips can still get them with Ctrl-clicking on them. This is far beyond the area of Lightroom 4's interface where users had to learn to give up a few settings to get some more information. Perhaps the most significant change is the the way images are displayed in the editing window. Images are displayed either in the "raw" mode, which is basically the same as before, or in the "Smart Preview" mode. The latter displays a higher resolution thumbnail of the edited image, and an enlarged version of this preview is available by clicking on the "Fit" tab. The preview is for purposes of quick examination of images prior to processing them and provides a sight that's more familiar to photographers, in my opinion. As with all versions, Lightroom 5 has a few minor issues with performance, even on a workstation with a decent amount of RAM. However, if you have a lot of RAM, you'll really notice the benefits of not having to wait for the software to get working. This is what I'm talking about: When I opened a previous catalog and tried to import over 50 image files, Lightroom simply hung. When I switched to a new catalog, although things improved dramatically, too many images were still displayed in the import window. In this review, I only measure speed at full speed with the existing catalog.
